Selected photographs

Kushal Ray's photography unfolds through a long, attentive relationship with people and the fragile worlds they inhabit. For decades, his images have lingered in places where life gathers without noise or being noticed: inside shared rooms, along streets where neighbours pause, in the gestures that bind families, strangers, and landscapes to one another. His practice is hardly about the grand but concerns itself with recognition, the moment when another life comes into focus and stays there. Ray's images are shaped by patience, proximity, and often precarity. They return repeatedly to thresholds: the doorway between interior and exterior, the pause between movement and stillness, the fragile interval between encounter and departure. In such suspended times and spaces, his work searches for the emotional textures of living be it tenderness, fatigue, care, companionship, waiting, longing, love, or loneliness.

Across bodies of work made in Kolkata and beyond, the photographs move between the dialectics of intimacy and distance without abandoning either. Images of domestic life hold the density of shared time, while the travel work opens onto barren landscapes where human presence appears precarious yet enduring. The people within these frames are never merely subjects; they participate in a shared moment of looking. Underlying this approach is an ethics of humanism, one that resists urgency and instead allows duration, where the slow accumulation of trust, repeated visits, and a sustained, sensitive gaze alter the meaning of image-making. This commitment has also shaped his role within Kolkata's photographic community, where he has been an unusually generous presence, encouraging and supporting younger photographers whose practices have since travelled widely. Seen together, the work proposes that belonging is not fixed to geography or identity but emerges through encounter. The stranger, the neighbour, the distant traveller, the family member, the exhausted rickshaw-puller all appear within a continuum of recognition. These images remind us that photography, at its most attentive, does not only document life -- it makes room for it.

Intimacies

1998 - 2012

Intimacies (1998 and 2012) traces the lived constellation of a multi-generational household over fourteen years, where Kushal Ray, both convalescent and companion, photographed the slow textures of shared life. Between chores, silences, arrivals, and departures, the series attends to friendship as a daily structure rather than a declared emotion. Running parallel to his austere Himalayan journeys, these images transform the ordinary into a quiet humanist lyric, locating love in gestures barely large enough to be named..

Intimacies remains widely regarded as Kushal Ray's most recognised and influential body of work, not only within his own practice but in the history of contemporary Indian documentary photography. The project's sustained attention to a single domestic world, photographed over years rather than visits, transformed it from a photographic series into a lived archive of moments, relationships, and the death of a beloved.

The images feel stark, bare, and exposed not because they aestheticize vulnerability, but because they arise from mutual recognition. Ray's camera does not stand outside the scene; it belongs to it. In this sense, each photograph operates at two scales simultaneously. It is an instant, a gaze, a pause, a click a body in light. But it is also an ecosystem, shaped by years of proximity, trust, and shared lives. The subject is never merely photographed; they are co-present in the making of the image, as attentive to the moment as the one who presses the shutter. Through this reciprocity, Intimacies reveals Ray not only as a documentarian of domestic life but as an image-maker for whom photography becomes a form of relation: an act of staying with, rather than looking at.

“My allegiance to ordinariness was ingrained in my childhood. I photograph not as an outsider but as someone who belongs. I tell my emotional autobiography through images of others. To do this I must be both witness and participant.”

In Kushal Ray's world, Manju Chatterjee was not simply photographed, she made the seeing possible. Her presence steadied the life around the work and the work within his life. Here, the portrait holds her with the same attention she gave his life's work. He often recalls that with her death, his heart broke.

“When Manju Chatterjee passed away I strongly felt that a large part of my life had died with her death. It was so heart-wrenching. A sudden emptiness enveloped me which I couldn't believe. But I always feel that a person is never dead until we have forgotten her. Photography for me is a medium through which I try to vivify the real with my passion, emotion, empathy and love shaping my creative vision. I tried my best to keep her alive in my images.”

Intimacies

My work on an extended Bengali family in Kolkata began in 1999 and spans a decade. It is more of an effort to explore relationships and intimacies that the members enjoyed among themselves than any perceived social documentary work on a joint family system. Being very close to the family made my work, to a large extent, personal and autobiographical.

Though I do not belong to the family, I lived with the members as an insider-outsider for four years and another six years saw me as a quotidian visitor to their eighty five year old house. During my long association, I was witness to and participant in the joys, losses and finally disintegration of the Chatterjee family. To chronicle the gamut of the multi-layered manifestations of the everyday lives of the ten people of four generations living under the same roof, I had to take a long journey with my camera.

Manju Chatterjee, a college lecturer, was the backbone of the family and the virtual architect of this work. I was immensely lucky to have her in my life. She was my greatest partner in my artistic journey. This body of work culminated in my first book Intimacies and has been dedicated to her memory.

Ladakh: A Syncretic Living 1987–2017

Kushal Ray's long-term engagement with Ladakh grew from travel into this epic journey of conviviality. Influenced by Robert Frank's belief that black and white holds the twin conditions of hope and despair, Ray found in Ladakh a landscape where those opposites seemed permanently intertwined in its harsh terrain, layered faiths, and resilient communities. Over three decades, the work moves between monastery, village, road, people, mountains, celebrations, and interior life, revealing Ladakh as an ordinary world that is layered and complex. The journey marked him deeply; it was here that Ray contracted tuberculosis in 1998, a reminder that the work wasn't only distant observation, it was a conviction and commitment, a certain something that was lived through the body as well as the camera.

“I did all these journeys on shoe-string budgets. After a longish journey I almost became broke. Sometimes didn't have money to get 24/25 rolls of film developed. Manju Chatterjee always came forward and paid for it.”

Rabari Women Series

1993 - 2006

Made during Ray's travels across the country, this series reflects a photographer learning to see through movement. He acknowledges Robert Frank as an early touchstone, valuing his honesty and faith in the unspectacular. These photographs hold the restlessness of the journey while already leaning toward

“Devout Hindu and 'custodian of animals ' the Rabari community of Kutch is the cynosure among the numerous tribes India has. It's women in gorgeous black embroidered with finesse and turbaned men in resplendent white, both wearing indigenous ornaments, mark their presence with rare elan and grace in their daily life, showing admirable resilience in a desert land. Though living in poverty, they can teach the best of fashion designers a lesson or two.”

Rabari women carrying water vessels pass through a sunlit settlement, their silhouettes etched against whitewashed walls. Ray's photograph frames daily labour as movement and structure, where the body becomes the site where landscape, necessity, and tradition converge.

The Weight of Water
[Series: Rabari Women, 1993 - 2006]

In this photograph, Ray approaches the women of the Rabari community through form and presence. The bodies become architectural, the garments become planes of light and shadow, and the single visible face anchors the image in an act of mutual recognition. As in much of his work, the photograph is not about documenting a community but imagistic essence of an encounter.

A line of women and children carrying water traces the settlement's narrow lane, turning a routine task into a visible chain of generational knowledge. Ray's photograph situates labour not as hardship alone, but as the everyday rhythm through which communities sustain itself.

On a settlement veranda, men work, a woman moves past, and a goat lingers nearby. Ray's photograph turns the threshold of the house into a social stage, where domestic life unfolds through small, simultaneous acts rather than a single focal event.

Once on a Train 2010 - Ongoing

In Ray's railway photographs, the train becomes less a vehicle than a passing world. Compartments fill with gestures, glances, routines, and brief moments that become large through these images. He doesn't seek for drama, rather, he lives in small continuities that travel with people wherever they go.

“I have always been fascinated by Indian Railways for its awesome multifaceted services. My childhood memories of train travels mingle with those of my youth and middle age. It's like a vast novel; you are it's reader as well as a character, who contributes his or her might towards the writing of the unending novel. As an independent photographer I wanted to travel all over India and experience and understand my country. Indian Railways have me the opportunity. I travelled alone extensively mostly in non AC sleeper class for my different photography projects. I got to know people and then as the journey ended the memories of acquaintances began to fade... I believe I owe these people enough. In all probability, I shall never have a chance to meet them again, but have the satisfaction of having their photos taken to remember them.”

In the cramped corridor of the carriage, a child brushes their teeth with solemn concentration, turning travel into something briefly like home. Ray removes pretenses and lies and manages to capture the quietness of clutter, the singularity of personhood in a crowd.

Making a Home in Motion
[Series: Once in a Train]

A woman pauses, a man looks back, others sit absorbed in their own directions. The image gathers these small, uncoordinated gestures into a composition of shared presence. The railway carriage appears here as something beyond passage, more akin to a temporary social world, held together for the duration of the journey.

Chinese community in Calcutta 2016 - Ongoing

This long-term project on Kolkata's Chinese community unfolds through friendship. Ray's sustained relationship with Haiying Chang and Yui Nan opens a way of photographing that privileges duration, trust, and time spent together. The images move between streets, encounters, and homes, tracing how community persists beyond nostalgia as a presence embedded into the texture of the city.

“My friendship since 2016 with Haiying Chang, a retired dentist and his wife Yui Nan, in Kolkata's Old Chinatown, has taught me to see life in a new light... Mr. Chang had to wind up his dental clinic in 2008 when a road accident rendered him physically challenged. Since then the couple had been completely dependent on the remittances sent by their off-springs. But they never thought of leaving Kolkata to live with their daughter or sons.”

A woman crosses the market holding trays of eggs, her movement threading through the dense fabric of Old Chinatown's street life. The photograph situates the Chinese community not as historical residue but as present-tense labour, embedded in the everyday commerce of the neighbourhood. Ray's framing emphasises continuity and community.

Woman with Egg Trays in Street Market

An elderly man occupies the foreground while the neighbourhood continues behind him, men talking, a scooter passing, shops shut or half-open. The image holds multiple temporalities at once: the individual life marked by age, and threads of the city's many histories.

Foreground, Background, Time
[Series: Chinese Community in Calcutta, 2016 - Ongoing]

Two old men greet each other in the open street, their gesture momentarily arresting the flow of the market. The photograph renders recognition itself as an event, a small yet sustaining affirmation of shared time, shared place, and shared survival. In Ray's work, such encounters function as social memory: fleeting, informal, yet foundational to the endurance of community.

Morning Encounter
[Series: Chinese Community in Calcutta, 2016 - Ongoing]

Inside their dimly lit room, Haiying Chang lies resting while Yui Nan sits beside him, the space holding the density of their lives shared together. The photograph carries the emotional arc of their story, exception yet non-exceptional. The image speaks of migration, loss, resilience, companionship, and rest. Ray's intimacy with the couple allows the image to exist as relation and not just observation.

Born in Kolkata in 1960, Kushal Ray began his professional life as a sports journalist at The Telegraph before turning to independent photography in 1991. Working across documentary photography, portraiture, and long-term social observation, he has since built a sustained practice centered on people, place, and everyday life.

His most recent solo exhibition, No One Is a Stranger: Photographs by Kushal Ray, was presented by Kolkata Centre for Creativity, Kolkata, in 2025, bringing together works spanning several decades of his practice. Earlier solo exhibitions include Everyday Life of an Exotic Land at Piramal Gallery, Mumbai (1998), presenting photographs from Ladakh. A solo institutional presentation of his photographs was also held at the University of East Anglia, Norwich, curated by Amit Chaudhuri; it was here that Dayanita Singh first encountered the work in 2010. His photographs were presented at the British Museum, London (2014), in a programme organised by the Royal Anthropological Institute, where images from Intimacies, the Ladakh series, and the portrait project Little Cinderellas Who Grow Up to Be Sour were screened during a public talk in the museum's main auditorium. The work has also appeared in several group exhibitions and festivals, including Relative Values: Some Current Trends in Indian Photography at the University of Southampton (UK), Click! Contemporary Photography in India at Vadehra Art Gallery (New Delhi and London), as well as the Singapore International Photography Festival, Delhi Photo Festival, and Chobi Mela, Dhaka.

The landmark project Intimacies (1998–2012), documenting a multi-generational Kolkata joint family, was published as a photobook by Niyogi Books with text by Kunal Basu and was nominated for the Le Bal des Débutantes Best Photobook Award, Paris (2012). The book has recently been reissued in a new edition by Mandas Publications, bringing the work back into circulation for a new generation of readers and viewers. He also received the Senior Fellowship from the Ministry of Culture, Government of India (2011), for his documentation of the Indian Railways, later published as Once On A Train, and was awarded the inaugural Dignity Grant from Dayanita Singh. Photographs from his early Ladakh series are held in the collection of the National Gallery of Modern Art, New Delhi.
